

Rage

Soft, alone. Driving, night. He knew the droughts had held him by the arm and asked him, earnestly, to face up. To accept it. His profession fell away, his experiences with patients did too. He wrenched at the hand. It wouldn't give and he felt as powerless as a child in a parent's iron grip. Something, however odd it might have been, began to click for him: while yes the grip was cold and hard, it was still only so in relative terms. If the moon could hold him accountable, perhaps the sun might free him. If the moon's clasp too resolute, maybe the sun could persuade a softer course. But yes, driving. Alone, soft. And always at night. Dr. Otsuka craved drives after droughts. It was his only way to avoid the fear of their blanknesses. This drive, though, was under different circumstances. It was a drive of remembering. Of how he'd been, of what he'd been in this last. If he weren't so explicitly craving the drive, he'd probably encourage someone in his shoes to do something similar themselves anyway. So why not. Burn some gas, animate an engine.

Impossible to know, but images sometimes came to the surface of his mind lately. Impossible to know. Impossible. Yet he still wondered if these images came from the moon too, like the droughts. Could you even say that droughts were "coming from" the moon, did that even make—

The images. His glasses wrapped around his thigh, almost about to slip to the floor, and his hand wiping away at his face. It reminded him of the times he'd have to use his wipers once or twice, in manual mode, and no more than that. On those days of scant rain. The subset days of the subset days. Except here he was, facing himself in a way he hadn't ever allowed for himself. And only a few tears. He didn't even need his sleeve for this few. Felt wrong. All that work and only this? Only a handful? Starving farmers must feel the same: a season of work for beet blood droplets.

He'd woken up in his bed. Caroline had been there, waiting for him. Driving now and looking back at this, he wanted to scoff. As if he himself were the patient. Although she had something for him and he recognized now that it was something he'd needed. And she? Uniquely positioned to afford it to him. The scoff, he suppressed it again. Good at that apparently.

More droplets. This time for the windshield. Caroline showing him had been odd enough on its own. He didn't even immediately recognize her—yet there she was, sleeping in his chair by the bed. Jolted up when she realized he was starting to wake. It took some time, but she eventually showed him a stethoscope. One that he recognized in his heart but found nowhere in his mind, and she began to explain that he needed to take his shirt off so she could "read" his heart. To him. To me? he'd said. Yes, she'd responded. With his shirt where his dog used to lay, she began to read his heart.

Maybe that's why the tears weren't coming here in the car: they'd already poured in the bed. He had had trouble breathing at times during her reading.

His shirt soaked by the end, from his reaching for something to dry himself. He didn't know much about Christianity but part of him imagined that the reading wasn't unlike the Latin readings of old. And she? Impossible as ever. Her words came to him like pharmakon, marching molecule-by-molecule into his ears. And she? Ears plugged by the stethoscope. She'd brought it out from an old dopp bag after explaining a little of what they were about to do. It's leather brand new, despite her explanation of where it came from. When she first pulled out the stethoscope, made contact with it I mean,—impossible. I'll try, but her reaction. Just, impossible. "Measure twice, cut once"—sure, if you like. But by contrast, this kind of measuring didn't matter. Wasn't countable, was lump-sum. Because he later learned knew precisely what she began to feel and to see. Of him.

She was holding his childhood. And her reaction to its touch. Her reaction tasted just as good as her reading. Her tone, her mood. Laughter and tears,—and sap that would go on to become amber to the historians of their time. For now it was to be felt and heard and seen and...—by she and him. No one else.

With tenderness, she narrated the moments he felt safest in his childhood. And those moments he'd never shared with anyone.